Statement from the Institute for Security Studies: response to 2012/13 SA Police Service (SAPS) crime statistics

Responding to the release today (19 September 2013) of the SA Police Service crime statistics for 2012/13, Institute for Security Studies’ analyst Gareth Newham said the following:

➢ ‘Serious and violent crime is increasing in South Africa. This shows that government’s approach to crime is not working.’

➢ ‘After a long period of decreases in serious and violent crime, these are the worst figures we have seen in ten years.’

➢ ‘Reducing crime is not only a police responsibility. There is also an important role for other government departments such as health, education and social development.’

➢ ‘Violence remains unacceptably high and should be treated as a serious crisis which stands in the way of South Africa’s social and economic development.’

➢ ‘We have seen increases in murder, attempted murder, car hijacking, street robbery and house robbery. These are some of the crimes South Africans are most afraid of.’

➢ ‘We understand that the police work under very difficult circumstances, and we applaud the many officers who work tirelessly to combat crime and to protect people and communities in South Africa.’
